By the terms of this treaty both parties agree to assist each other with men, arms, and ammunition when required, and also to assist in the protection of each other's colonies by sending troops or warships. For generations the treaty of alliance with Great Britain has been the key-stone of Portugal's foreign policy. Upon the outbreak of war Portugal declared thit she regarded the treaty as operative.

Portugal had still, though to a smaller degree than before the Revolution, two weak points—her party politics and her Colonial possessions. Upon these two weak points the strategic instinct of Germany fastened, and upon both she directed her most formidable forces of intrigue. Dr. Theophile Braga, the ex-President of the Republic, has described the result. It was not long before a coup d'état in Lisbon and a colonial war in Africa effectively neutralised Portugal. The reactionary dictatorship continued into the summer of last year. It was probably preparing in of those debating points of which Mr. Interest and development of unitary command. It was probably preparing, in the ex-President's opinion, a Royal rethe ex-President's opinion, a Royal restoration under German auspices at the cost of the Colonies. In Angola, the most important of these Colonies on the west coast of Africa, a German raid from South-West Africa and the incitement of the native population absorbed a large part of the military strength of Portugal.

In the early summer of last year a counter-revolution, carried through under the guns of the Fleet, overthrew the dictatorship, restored constitutional government, and restored with it the national foreign policy. The strong man whom the counter-revolution brought into power, Dr. Affonso Costa, a warm partisan of the Allies, had to walk warily. Gradually, however, the forces of German intrigue were suppressed. The situation in the African Colonies was got under control. Portugal's neutrality became more and more "benevolent" towards the Allies, until finally Dr. Costa was ready for more decisive action. A telegram says that Brazil is owed a considerable sum of money by Germany, and, being unable to get it, will take the ships lying in Brazilian waters instead. Should Brazil follow this line of action, it will be a decided blow to Germany, for, following her own example, she would have to declare war on Brazil, a country in which she has great possessions, a large number of subjects, and many prospects.

It is said that the Government has not yet arrived at any solution of the proposed moratorism for married men under the Derby scheme. The practical difficulties surrounding the problem seem to increase rather than to decrease on inspection. A suggestion is made that married men called up shall be allowed, wherever it is possible, to do their training at places convenient to their homes, devoting a proportion of their time to looking after their work or business. This might serve in the case of the manual worker, nor would it suit the military authorities, who want the men altogether and cannot afford to take stock of business considerations. It should not, however, be impossible to devise some scheme of training that would help to keep a number of men at their employment until the time has come when they must go.

The following statement has been issued at

"The whole procedure of the Portuguese Government, therefore, represents a serious violation of existing laws and treaties. The Portuguese Government by this procedure openly showed that it regards itself as a vassal of Great Britain, which subordinates all other considerations to British interests and wishes. Furthermore, the Portuguese Government effected the seizure of vessels in a manner in which the intention to provoke Germany cannot fail to be seen. The German flag was hauled down in the German reseals and the Portuguese flag with a war pennant was hoisted, and the flagship of the Admiral fired a salute. Mr. Bolger (Wexford) said he thought that Mr. Russell's request ruled out the deputation altogether, because they had hitherto got the assistance of the Constabulary all over the country.

Mr. Halligan (Meath) said he was very sorry Mr. Russell had ruled out that point, as they had great hopes that, although the Constabulary had given very great help in Meath in the past, they would go further in future. They considered that the police should be asked to see the Order carried out.

He was informed by Mr. Prentice that the adoption of the Order need not cost anything if the local authorities went into the business and put 1d. per head on sheep dip. They should take into consideration that one-half of Ireland took no interest whatever in the matter, and they sent scabby sheep into clean counties and across to England.

Mr. Ennis said the main object was to make an effort with the co-operation of the Department to secure the services of the Constabulary as far as possible.

Mr. Prentice, Chief Veterinary Inspector, said the dipping must be carried out at certain periods, and as the supervision would practically occupy nearly all the time of the Constabulary at these periods, the Inspector-General limited their work in connection with it. Mr. Russell said the only object of the end. They could not allow one-half of Ireland to override the Act of Parliament and the disease. He thought they had better see the Inspector-General and inform him of the views of the deputation, and find out how far he is able and willing to go. His (Mr. Russell's) own idea was that they were expecting too much from the police, who had voluntarily given them every assistance without being

He had always found the Inspector-General

if he saw his way to allow the police to assist

he would do so.
